General Description:

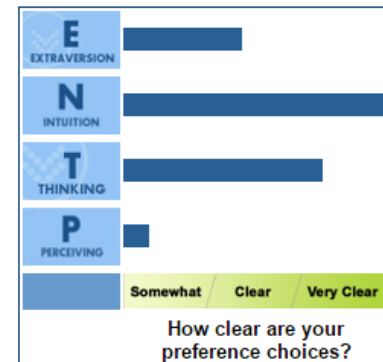

ENTPs are creative thinkers who see many ways of getting things done and logically analyze how different choices might turn out. They are curious, wanting to know what else besides the routine approach might work, and they are flexible, always willing to try something new. They dislike regular routine and find themselves constantly pulled to new adventures before they've finished their old ones. They have an almost supernatural ability to accurately analyze people and events; they are visionary leaders. ENTPs can be persuasive speakers, able to communicate a vision more easily than others.

Summary of Careers

ENTPs enjoy trouble-shooting and the challenge of solving complex problems using creative approaches. They dislike routine and become bored quickly if they don't need to be imaginative and creative. They are at their best in the initial stages of projects, and they would rather "plant the crop than harvest it." In other words, once the conceptual problems are solved, they lose interest and it might be best for them to hand the situation over to someone else to finish. Careers that respect these traits include photography, writing, engineering, computer sciences, research sciences, entertainment and law.
